THE UNFIXING is a poetic exploration of a mother's journey from illness to healing, framed by the intensifying global climate crisis. The film presents a richly textured visual diary, capturing the intimate moments of Betancourt's personal struggles with a debilitating illness and the ripple effects on her family, all while engaging with larger ecological questions. As her body begins to break down, so too does the planet – both requiring a radical transformation and renewal.

Screening times:

3Below Theatre, San Jose, California - Saturday March 15th 6:50pm

Upcoming festivals:

17th Millenium Film Festival, Belgium - March 28th-April 6th 2025

In THE UNFIXING, Nicole Betancourt, a Brooklyn-born mother of two, offers an immersive diary of destruction, grief, love, and renewal. After a surfing accident triggers inexplicable symptoms that leave her unable to work or parent her children, Nicole embarks on a journey of self-discovery. Her youngest child, Blue, shares their deep anxiety about inheriting a world ravaged by the climate crisis, while her older child, Pilar, battles Chronic Lyme disease — a disease spreading via bites from insects, like deer ticks, that is exacerbated by the climate crisis. Through an intricate blend of family archives, vérité, and animation, Nicole traces the interconnected threads of grief, joy, crises and connection. Her journey culminates in a heartwarming vision of hope and possibility, as she reconnects with the natural world and finds healing not only for herself but for the planet she loves.

Logline & Synopses

Logline:

A joyful tapestry of life and landscape, THE UNFIXING reveals one mother's path from illness to healing and from climate despair to environmental awakening.

Short synopsis:

A joyful tapestry of life and landscape, THE UNFIXING reveals one mother's path from illness to healing and from climate despair to environmental awakening. As the climate crisis escalates, a debilitating illness threatens the filmmaker's life, then her daughter's life, taking the family to breaking point. Turning the camera on herself and the exquisite patterns in nature around her, Nicole meditates on how destruction, grief, transformation, and ultimately hope, ripple outward, echoing across generations and landscapes. Adrift yet lucid, these waking visions chart a course not only to personal healing, but also a new narrative from which to see the world.

Long synopsis:

In THE UNFIXING, Nicole, a Brooklyn born mother of two, offers an immersive diary of destruction, grief, pain, love, and transformation. Using family archives, verité, and animation to meticulously weave a pathway of heartwarming scenes, she explores how all these ripple outward, echoing across generations and landscapes.

A surfing accident triggers seemingly disparate symptoms in Nicole, she cannot work and can barely parent her kids. No doctor can identify the cause. As she begins to unravel the mystery of what is wrong with her, she discovers larger and larger questions connecting her journey with her parents, her children, and Mother Earth.

Her youngest child, Blue, expresses their deep anxiety about the climate crisis. >>>

They tell her that the Earth their generation is inheriting “is like getting a broken present and we’re expected to fix it.” They have lost part of their mother to illness and they are losing parts of the planet - polluted oceans, burnt forests, and dying species - to the global environmental crisis.

Then Nicole’s older child Pilar gets sick with chronic Lyme disease - which is on the rise because of climate change. She has episodes of paralysis and is unable to go to school. Nicole’s survival strategy of learning from her own losses now becomes impossible.

Losing her will to live, Nicole has a vision of her father who died of AIDS when it too was little understood. Seeing him at peace gives her the courage to face the heartbreak, both personal and global, around her. By exploring the visual, scientific, and spiritual threads interconnecting these losses she begins to move her own grief for the years lost to illness out of the shadows.

Nicole and Pilar are in the Rocky Mountains seeking treatment while forest fires fill the air with smoke. The pandemic is in full throttle. Nicole is terrified and losing faith - is the story a tragedy? She is reminded about her lessons in neuroplasticity - that fear blocks learning and leads to the very pathway she doesn’t want. She must release her fear and find a way forward.

Through a series of encounters with wise women, nature, and her own dreams, Nicole discovers that the whole world is not broken, there is beauty and regeneration and change. She hikes alone up a mountain to a stunning alpine lake. Wild Gray Jays approach her and eat out of her hand, filling her with pure joy, renewal, and wonder. Finding comfort that we - all of us - are just a very small part of this planet that created us, she concludes that we can cast a new story in our bodies and in the landscape. One that transforms the uncertainty and loss and sees possibility and hope as we forge a future together.

Interview with the director

The Movement Below The Surface: I nterview with Nicole Betancourt

What is the connection between your health and the climate crisis?

THE UNFIXING looks at the human body as part of the earth. The most dominant systems in medicine and industry were not created with a reverence for the interconnection of life. Don't polluted water and air impact our health?

Trying to separate, define, and fix all of these little parts of me didn't really help me heal as much as understanding how interconnected I am with the Earth. Facing chronic illness, like facing the climate crisis, involves ongoing loss and an uncertain future. With the climate crisis and with chronic illness, the losses can feel like they are piling up with no end in sight. This is different from losing a loved one where we are expected to grieve the loss. Climate grief and grief over our lost abilities are not acknowledged by our dominant culture, there is no place for them. How do we heal without first acknowledging what we are losing?

In the film I learn to surrender, grieve, and ultimately heal partly through my relationship with nature. Healing our bodies means healing our relationship with each other and the earth. We gain this perspective in the film with the guidance of the wise women I meet on my journey. THE UNFIXING is a story of motherhood in widening circles, the stories of daughters, mothers, and mother earth.

Why this film now?

So many young people are anxious and in despair, and why wouldn't they be? They are growing up with looming pandemics, social injustice, and climate disasters. As my child Blue said at the age of 12, "I don't really have hope that the world's going to turn around." I want to help transform that fear of an uncertain future into interest in a potentially transformed future. If we don't believe things can change, who will?

We are living in a time of transition, a liminal world. I hope that this film offers another way to face the sickness in our bodies and planet, a path of allowing, listening, receiving - all things I thought were passive. Now I know they are active, courageous, and acts of rebellion.

How is the film helpful for people with Myalgic Encephalomyelitis (ME/CFS) or other chronic conditions like Long Covid and Lyme?

When I was sickest and when my daughter Pilar was sickest, the voice in my head and the response from doctors made me question my own reality. I thought, if doctors don't see something wrong with me, am I not sick? Am I just weak or crazy? This happens a lot to women when visiting doctors. When medical professionals don't understand our conditions, we are often seen as hysterical, over-sensitive, or hypochondriacs. This lack of validation is extremely stressful. THE UNFIXING shows the disconnect between what I was experiencing and what doctors were saying. When I was finally diagnosed with ME/CFS it was liberating, but it was also challenging. There is no cure for ME/CFS, yet I had to believe I could get better in order to heal myself. So my message to those who are sick like me is that your symptoms are real, you have been suffering, and you can get better.

Interview cont.

At times the film has a surreal quality to it. Where did that come from?

Because I couldn't just take a pill and be cured - there is no pill to cure ME/CFS - it forced me on a metaphysical journey that surprisingly helped me heal.

Popular experiences with ayahuasca and psilocybin are now recognized as healing modalities for all kinds of ailments and traumas. For me it was a little different. I wasn't taking hallucinogens. My illness suspended me between sleep and wakefulness for hours a day and I started having visions and lucid dreams. I would see things and have these visions - like feeling the voice of nature. And that made me want to know more. If I couldn't figure out how to craft a scene, I would ask myself about it while falling asleep. Then I would dream about that scene and wake up with the answer. In essence, much of the THE UNFIXING was created in my dreams.

What change do you want THE UNFIXING to inspire?

It is my hope that this film can be useful as a tool to help heal our relationship with nature and our bodies. Our personal narratives and our individual relationships with nature are fundamental for making concrete changes to the complex systems wreaking havoc on our health and our world. My vision is that when people hear our stories they will feel more comfortable talking about their own stories, allowing people to grieve and ultimately dream together.

But how do you see this film making a difference in the real world?

How can we learn from ancient wisdom and from nature herself? More and more people are asking this question including the study of biomimicry, systems theory, different modalities to heal trauma, neuroplasticity, integrated medicine, and shared indigenous wisdom. It is about finding a way to live in right-relationship with life. As Adrienne Maree Brown says in the film, if, like starling birds flying by the thousands in murmurations, we pay attention to the relationship with the group of birds around us, "We will find ourselves flocking together." And from this internal and external alignment, solutions will emerge that we can't even imagine from where we are standing now. This is the system theory concept of emergence.

What is emerging could be defined as spiritual, cultural, or psychological change - the stories we tell to each other and even to ourselves are fundamental to making a shift in the world. Science shows that stories change our chemistry and the wiring of our brains. But our stories about nature aren't just changing us, they are changing the landscape. Our extractionist relationship with the Earth has created the climate crisis, pollution, and loss of life. Changing our fundamental belief from seeking power over nature to seeking power with nature would change the systems we create, which would shape our behaviors, and ultimately there would be different outcomes. Cultural and political change starts with how we change the narrative. THE UNFIXING is my contribution to that narrative.
